HUMAN RIGHTS EDUCATION IN THE PHILIPPINES: STATUS, CHALLENGES, AND FUTURE DIRECTIONS

CONCEPT NOTE

I. Introduction and Rationale

Human Rights Education (HRE) bears a significant role in the protection and promotion of individual rights, freedom, justice, and peace. Through HRE, rights-holders are empowered to “claim their rights” which thereby prevents any possibility of abuses. The duty-bearers, on the other hand, are capacitated “to meet their obligations to protect, respect, and fulfill” rights standards.¹

There exists a legal framework in the Philippines that promotes human rights education. No less than the 1987 Constitution guarantees the promotion of human rights through education.² The country is also a signatory to various international treaties and declarations that promote the teaching of human rights.³ Different domestic statutes had similarly mandated the adoption of human rights education by all educational and training institutions.⁴

Despite this, however, promoting HRE in the country remains a challenge. A 2012 study revealed that HRE is being facilitated at an appreciation level only and the programs related to the teaching of human rights are being implemented for mere compliance.⁵

Given these conditions, there is a need to bring to the surface the current status of HRE in the country and locate the challenges that confront its promotion. In so doing, it is equally important to discuss current best practices that address these issues and map ways forward.

Thus, a forum on HRE is proposed. The event will provide a space where all stakeholders gather and learn from a panel of expert resource persons, and at the same time all participants are given the opportunity to share their thoughts and insights.
